

THE LEGEND OF THE BRIAR ROSE

As boom-town Breckenridge approached the year 1900, the Briar Rose Mine was turning out generous deposits of silver. The Briar Rose miners began their day as the first light of sun touched the Ten Mile Range. By nightfall these men would return to town tired, dirty and always hungry. To satisfy their needs they would head for the shelter of their boarding house on Lincoln Street. In this rough wooden building they would enjoy a hearty meal, a shot or two of their favorite whiskey, maybe a hand of poker and then on upstairs to their rooms for a night's sleep.

As the mine prospered, and the Briar Rose workers raved about their fine meals, many outsiders began to frequent the boarding house. Business prospered and the small house expanded. For years, people came from neighboring towns to enjoy good food and drink in this warm atmosphere.

But the mining era faded away and the men of the Briar Rose moved on as the silver lodes diminished. The boarding house was abandoned and in later years burned to the ground. In the early 1960's, another structure was built on Lincoln Street in the style of the mining house. She was named after the old silver mine and dedicated to the old spirit of fine dining and drinking.

Today the Briar Rose Mine may still be seen atop Peak Ten and good meals may still be enjoyed in her fine tradition.

So Welcome to the Briar Rose!
