

Commitment to Learning

Scale	Criteria
5	You are an outstanding student; you meet all deadlines and work is completed to your highest ability. You demonstrate independent learning skills and are a pleasure to teach. You are a role model for others with your positive attitude and commitment to your learning.
4	You are a student who is positive in class and contributes to a good classroom ethos. You generally work to the level of which you are capable and almost always meet deadlines. You have a positive approach to learning, demonstrating a good attitude and are continuing to develop your independent learning skills.
3	Although you may sometimes produce good work, you usually only complete the minimum required. Your attitude can be variable which is impacting on your progress. There is plenty of room for improvement if you are going to achieve your full potential.
2	You are consistently causing concern for your teacher. The problem is being addressed within the subject department and your parents have been contacted. Your poor commitment to learning is a particular concern, having a major impact on your learning and progress. This level of commitment means that you are likely to be underachieving and at risk of not meeting your full potential.
1	You are causing serious concern in this subject; this score is the lowest that can be awarded. You do not appear to value your own learning, your poor attitude is extremely disappointing with no regard to its impact on your progress. Deadlines are frequently missed and the standard of your work is very poor. The Curriculum Leader, Head of Year and your parents have already been contacted and involved in challenging and supporting your learning.
