1) Introduction

Archaeologists discovered Phoenician glass artefacts dating back to the 1st and 2nd centuries in the holy land. The stained glass windows in the structure built over the Cave of the Patriarchs date to the 12th century. Glass blowing was invented by Phoenicians between 400 and 50 BC, somewhere along the ancient Greater Canaan coast, where glassworkers discovered how to expand a molten blob of glass by introducing some air into it. This glass making art is a tradition in the holy land, which has been passed through generations of artisans.

Creating the colourful waves of phoenician glass requires particular knowledge that takes especially skilled hands, which are the masters of this beautiful and exotic art. A unique blend of glass elements are melted in high temperature ovens. In Phoenician glass blowing, artisans add substances to the molten glass, with the resulting reaction creating a range of colours. The hot liquid quickly cools into restful shapes and unique patterns as it is blown and spun on the end of a long metallic tube, finally resulting in a beautiful piece of luminescent glass with swirled colours and patterns giving each piece its own unique blend of colour and pattern, where no one phoenician glass is exactly the same as the other one.

These craftsmen were the first to master the Phoenician glass art. As materials became too expensive during the 1940's, this art faded. Exotic Artistries Group is proud to have sourced this revived form of ancient glass artistries to beautify and adorn Australian homes.
