Disclaimer

Due to Covid 19 most support or service provision will be online until further notice and information for support in general may not be accurate. Please check with the service providers directly to clarify their service provision. DFA are holding most of their autism support groups online (Discord) until further notice, these online support groups are free of charge. Please email Trish Darke for more information —

About the Guide

This guide has been written with the support of adult Autistic members of Dimensions for Autism CIC (DFA). It was first published on the DFA website in April 2019.

DFA is an adult autism support group based in Devon. If you are an adult on the spectrum and want to add any information to this guide (when it is updated) then please email trishdarke.dimensionsforautism@gmail.com

Who is this guide for?

First and foremost, this guide is aimed at Autistic people, and those who suspect they are Autistic, who live in the county of Devon, whether they have a formal diagnosis or not. It includes services and support in all three local authorities in the county - Devon County Council, Plymouth Council and Torbay Council.

This guide also includes information for the relatives, partners and friends of Autistic adults, as well as those who act as carers for someone on the spectrum.

Why the 'Yellow Brick Road'?

Autism is complex, varied and poorly understood. The services and support on offer to them can be even more so. This guide aims to provide a path through the confusion, from getting a diagnosis onwards, and to act as a series of signposts to point you in the direction of the specific services you may need.

So why a yellow road? Because the colour gold (chemical symbol 'Au') is often associated with autism - but our funding wouldn't quite stretch to a gold brick road, so we did the best we could with what we had.

How to use this Guide

To make this guide easy to use, it is split into sections that cover specific themes or types of services. Of course, some organisations offer a range of different services, so don't be surprised if you see the same name in several sections.

We've tried to provide as many different ways of contacting these organisations as possible, to help you get to the services you need. The contact info is symbol-coded, as in the example below.

Organisations Each organisation included in the guide gets its own short description. We've tried to include as much information as we can about what is on offer, but it's a good idea to contact the organisation or visit their website for full details. Website Telephone number SMS Text number Email address Groups Some organisations have sub-groups for specific services. We've provided as many details about these as possible wherever we can. What is Autism?

In brief, autism is the name given to a range of neurological and sensory differences that appear to affect around 1-2% of the population. These differences are built into the brain and nervous system from the earliest stages of development, and are present for life, affecting the way Autistic people experience and interact with the world.

While each Autistic individual will, of course, have a unique experience, there are common factors that usually fall into four main categories.

Sensory

Almost all Autistic people experience at least some sensory differences from the population at large These can range from mild to intense, and include all the senses of the human body, not just the five well-known ones.

Sensory issues can include (but are not limited to):

- Being extremely sensitive to light, sound or touch
- Finding it hard (or even impossible) to tell when they are hungry, too hot or cold, or in pain
- Having specific preferences for food flavours and/or textures
- Appearing clumsy due to poor balance, spatial awareness and/or hand-eye coordination

Executive Function

'Executive function' broadly refers to the brain's ability to process, organise and respond to the information it receives. These functions can be impaired in Autistic people, sometimes as a result of having to deal with an overload of sensory information (see above).

Executive function issues can appear as (but are not limited to):

- Having a poor short-term memory
- Finding it difficult to keep track of the passage of time
- Having to concentrate hard in fast-changing environments
- Becoming so absorbed in their interests that you cease to notice almost anything else

Behaviour

As a result of the overlap of the previous two categories, many Autistic people struggle to get by in the day-to-day world. This often leads them to develop coping strategies and behaviours that make life more comfortable.

There are, of course, as many 'Autistic behaviours' as there are Autistic people, but some frequently noted behaviours are:

- Preferring consistency, familiarity and/or routine
- Intense fascination with specific subjects, people or sensory experiences
- Avoiding busy, crowded or fast-changing environments
- Making repetitive movements ('stimming') to relieve stress or muscle tension

Socialising

While central to the classic definition of autism, the social interaction challenges Autistic people often experience are better understood today as a side-effect of having a brain that is wired differently from the majority. They are still used as a core diagnostic category, though, and are often the most obvious sign of the condition to others.

While communication is, of course, a two-way activity, Autistic people do report some common issues:

- Focusing on the words that are spoken in conversations rather than non-verbal signals (facial expressions, body language, gestures)
- Difficulty following multiple, overlapping speakers in busy environments
- Preference for practical, goal-oriented interactions over 'small talk' and socialising for its own sake

As these examples show, there is no single thing that is 'autism'. This makes it an extremely difficult term to summarise, because it encompasses a range of experiences as broad and varied as the number of Autistic individuals in the world.

The Autistic Spectrum

Growing awareness, as more people have been identified and diagnosed, has revealed the diversity of experiences of Autistic people. At the same time, it showed that a lot of these individuals don't fit neatly into the categories created by clinicians over the years; most straddle the gaps between them or shift from one to another throughout their lives.

The term 'Autistic spectrum' was coined to reflect this variability. While sometimes presented as a straight line between the 'worst' and 'mildest' cases, the spectrum actually acts as an umbrella term to acknowledge both the similarities and the differences of individual experiences.

Today, a diagnosis of 'Autism Spectrum Disorder' (ASD) is common - although some prefer to use the more neutral Autism Spectrum Condition (ASC). This has mostly replaced a range of diagnostic terms that were previously given to specific sub-groups of Autistic people, though you may still encounter people who use them informally:

- Asperger's Syndrome
- High-Functioning Autism (HFA)
- Pathological Demand Avoidance (PDA) (see appendix 5)
- Pervasive Developmental Disorder Not Otherwise Specified (PDD-NOS)

Co-occurring Conditions

While not every Autistic person experiences other issues, there are some conditions that are diagnosed more often in the Autistic community than they are in the general population.

The exact relationship between these other conditions and autism - whether they are an expression of the underlying sensory or executive function issues, or separate conditions altogether - is currently unclear, but regardless of the source, these often need to be considered independently when deciding how best to support the individual:

- Attention Deficit Disorder (ADD) or Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder (ADHD)
- Dyslexia, Dyspraxia, Dyscalculia, Dysgraphia, and other specific learning difficulties
- Intellectual Disabilities (ID)
- Anxiety, depression, and other mental health issues
- Epilepsy and other seizures
- Obsessive Compulsive Disorder (OCD)

Autism and the Law

Even after it was recognised as a distinct condition, autism continued to be treated as a sub-type of learning disability. More recently, however, the UK government has recognised that autism needs to be treated on its own terms. It has passed legislation aimed at addressing the requirements of Autistic people.

The Equality Act 2010

Welding together 116 existing pieces of legislation, this broad Act created a framework to define discriminatory treatment that targeted specific sub-groups of society, and to provide protection for these sub-groups.

At its core, the Act declares a number of 'protected characteristics', including (among others) age, race, gender identity, sexual orientation, religious belief and disability. With few exceptions, any behaviour that disadvantages anyone with one or more of these protected characteristics, whether direct or indirect, is unlawful. The act also outlaws harassment of these groups, and the victimisation of anyone who makes (or supports someone else in making) a complaint about discriminatory behaviour.

To try and ensure equal treatment of these protected groups, the act defines three main means of reducing or eliminating discrimination.

- Positive Action this is mainly aimed at employers and empowers them to take active steps to encourage recruitment, retention and advancement people with protected characteristics ahead of those who do not.
- Reasonable Adjustments this broader category covers any change an organisation can make to remove or reduce barriers protected people may face in accessing their services (see more about this in appendix 5)
- Public Sector Equality Duty this places a specific requirement on public bodies, as well as private companies providing a public service (e.g. power and water utilities), to actively eliminate unlawful discrimination and promote equality and good relations between protected and non-protected groups.

While individual Autistic people may not consider themselves disabled, all autism spectrum diagnoses are considered to fall under the 'disability' characteristic. This entitles Autistic people to all the protections of the Equality Act.

The Autism Act 2009

The first piece of autism-specific legislation passed in the UK, and the only act targeted at improving services for one disability, the Autism Act laid out in law the government's duty to meet the needs of its Autistic citizens.

The act outlines two key requirements:

- The Government must create a strategy to meet the need of Autistic adults, including regular reviews.
- The Government must produce statutory guidance for local authorities to implement the strategy.

In practice, this meant that national government had to formulate a strategy to identify and diagnose Autistic adults in the community, and to provide appropriate support for them throughout their lives. Local authorities are then required to deliver on this strategy by providing diagnostic and support services, and by ensuring that medical professionals and frontline staff are given appropriate awareness training.

The Fulfilling and Rewarding Lives Strategy 2010

Published in the wake of the Autism Act a year earlier, this strategy set out general guidelines for implementing the act's requirements, with the overarching goal of enabling Autistic people to live 'fulfilling and rewarding lives' (hence the title) within their communities.

The strategy identified four key areas to be targeted for improvement:

- Increasing awareness and understanding of autism by creating training packages for those in health, social care and the criminal justice system
- Developing a clear, consistent pathway for diagnosis, and ensuring that those with a diagnosis are eligible for care and support
- Improving access to appropriate services and support for Autistic people, to help them live as independently as possible.
- Providing support for Autistic people to find and stay in employment, including raising awareness of autism with employers.
- Ensuring that local authorities set up autism-focused boards to implement and monitor these improvements, using the involvement of Autistic people and their carers to guide development of appropriate services.

To oversee these improvements, the government set up a National Autism Programme Board to help develop training for health professionals and provide guidance on the kinds of reasonable adjustments to be made to make services more accessible to Autistic people.

The 'Think Autism' Strategy 2014

Following a review of the Fulfilling and Rewarding Lives strategy, the government published an update in 2014. This 'Think Autism' document reinforced and extended the goals of the original, while also trying to address its shortcomings.

The main goal of the document was to extend the government's autism strategy beyond service providers and employers to build general awareness and acceptance in entire communities. It set up a temporary Autism Innovation Fund to support the development of community care and support, especially for those Autistic people who did not qualify for statutory services. To give shape to what a 'fulfilling and rewarding' life should be, it defined 15 priority challenges - also known as the 'I Want' statements.

To ensure these goals were consistently implemented across the country, the document proposed improvements in data collection by local authorities about their Autistic constituents. It also stated that Autistic people should be able to access information about the services available to them, as well as being able to compare their locality's performance against that of others.

The Care Act 2014

While not directly autism-related, this act is important because it lays out the duties local authorities have to assess need for and provide care to (when appropriate) those constituents who need it.

It is an extremely long and complex piece of legislation, but in the broadest terms it states that:

- Local governments must provide needs assessments to anyone who seems to need some form of care and support, regardless of how likely they are to be eligible for support.
- They must also provide separate Carer's Assessments for individuals who meet the criteria as carers for a person with a disability (e.g. parents).
- Assessments must focus on the wellbeing and life goals of the person. They should involve the person directly, as well as their carer and/or someone else they nominate to assist them, wherever possible.
- Care should be provided with the goal of preventing the person's needs from becoming more serious, or at least delaying this as long as possible.
- Those assessed as needing support should be able to choose from a range of high-quality local providers to meet their requirements. Information on these care providers should be readily available to users.
- These rights apply regardless of whether the person being cared for is a child or an adult. A child who is about to turn 18 must be given a Child's Needs Assessment (CNA) to evaluate their probable needs as an adult, and their existing care left in place until this is completed.

If you believe you may be eligible for an Assessment of Needs or a Carers Assessment, it is worth researching important acts in more detail to find out how it might apply to your specific situation - see Appendix 1 for links to further information.

Statutory Services

Diagnostic Services

If you suspect you are autistic, your first port of call is your GP. Under the Autism Act, local authorities must provide a pathway to diagnosis. This service is free, but you need to be referred to it by your GP. See Getting a Diagnosis for more details.

Assessments of Needs

Anyone who thinks they may need support may be entitled to a Needs Assessment (also called an Assessment of Needs) from their local authority. This service is free, and you can ask for an assessment yourself - you don't need to be referred by someone else. A formal Autism Spectrum diagnosis is helpful, but you don't need one: the assessment is about your needs as an individual, not a list of symptoms.

To refer yourself for an assessment, you will need to contact the care provider of the local authority for the area you live in: You may be asked to complete a self-assessment, If you feel you are not able to communicate your needs adequately, or for any other reason relating to a condition or disability, please inform the team and ask to bypass this process as a reasonable adjustment. Also please note that those who are also carers should have a separate carers assessment as well as an assessment of needs.

Carer's Assessments

Anyone who acts as a carer for an Autistic person may be entitled to their own separate Carer's Assessment, to determine what impact the caring responsibilities have on their lives and what support they might be entitled to.

As with Needs Assessments, you can refer yourself for a Carer's Assessment, but in some areas, you will need to contact a different organisation: You may be asked to complete a self-assessment, If you feel you are not able to communicate your needs adequately, or for any other relating to a condition or disability, please inform the team and ask to bypass this process as a reasonable adjustment.

Benefits

Autistic people are entitled to the same unemployment benefits as any other UK citizen. In England, the legacy benefits system has now been replaced with Universal Credit for all new claimants. You can find out more about the Universal Credit system using the following links:

www.gov.uk/universal-credit

www.understandinguniversalcredit.gov.uk/

On top of the standard benefits system, you may also be eligible for a Personal Independence Payment (PIP), depending on how much your condition impacts your day-to-day living.

To request a PIP application form, or find out more about the application process:

www.gov.uk/pip/how-to-claim

0800 917 2222

The application process can be long and complex, so getting advice and support can increase your chances of success. Consider contacting your local Citizens' Advice Bureau (CAB) for guidance:

www.citizensadvice.org.uk/

If you are receiving benefits and also looking for work, your local Jobcentre may employ a Disability Employment Advisor. These can offer employment assessments to help identify your skills and the kinds of work that might suit you. They may also be able to refer you to support schemes like Access to Work.

If you have (or are about to start) a job, but feel you need adjustments that your employer can't (or won't) provide, the Access to Work department can provide assistance and support. If you are eligible, you may be given a grant in addition to your other benefits, to be spent on specialist equipment, a support worker or travel adaptations.

Special Educational Needs

Every local authority is required to provide a Local Offer, a collection of all the education, health and social care services that are available to people with SEND aged 0-25.

Each local authority in the county of Devon has its own Local Offer:

Devon County Council

Torbay Council

www.torbay.gov.uk/schools-and-learning/send/local-offer

SENDreforms@torbay.gov.uk

If regular SEND support is not enough, you can also apply to your local authority for an Education, Health and Care Plan (EHCP). This is a transferable report that details the additional educational, health and social needs of the person, along with any assistance required to meet those needs.

Anyone who believes a child may need additional support can request an assessment for an EHCP, including the child themselves if they are aged 16 or over. Once in place, an EHCP can remain in force until the person turns 25.

For general information about EHCPs:

www.gov.uk/government/publications/send-code-of-practice-0-to-25

The National Autistic Society (NAS) also have an EHCP guide:

Advocacy

If you are struggling to communicate with or express your needs to service providers, you may be entitled to advocacy support. This may mean nominating a friend or relative to speak on your behalf, or you may be able to get support from an advocacy service or charity.

The Devon Advocacy Consortium is a partnership of six charities that offer professional advocacy services for any over-16s who has a Social Worker and need advice or representation in making a health or social care issue or complaint (there are strict criteria). To make a referral for advocacy you will need to speak to your Social Worker, as they are currently not accepting self-referrals.

Autism Alert Card

Devon County Council and Devon and Cornwall Police have collaborated to create an Autism Alert Card for residents of the region. This is available for free to any county resident who believes they are Autistic - a formal diagnosis is not required.

Getting a Diagnosis

Preparing for Diagnosis

At present, there is no definitive biological test for autism, so clinicians have to rely on observations of the person's behaviour and lifestyle. Some of this will be done during face-to-face assessments, but this is not always reliable, especially if the person has learned to conceal (mask) their Autistic nature.

Because of this, most diagnostic services will assess your behaviour against the following criteria:

- Issues with social communication, social interaction and/or social imagination (this is often referred to as the 'triad of impairments')
- Behaviours or interests that are repetitive, restrictive or obsessive
- Difficulties with everyday life
- All of the above were present from an early age

To help the clinician get a clear picture, it is a good idea to prepare and bring along some other sources of information to support your case, such as:

- Doctors' reports of any physical or mental health issues, or other diagnosed conditions, you may have
- Written testimonies about what you were like as a baby or young child, like reports from teachers or support workers
- In-person testimonies from relatives, friends, or anyone else who can provide insight into your life and behaviour, especially as a baby or young child

Public Diagnostic Services

Under the Autism Act, every UK citizen should have access to a publicly available diagnostic pathway. The service is free, but you will need to be referred by your GP to access the service - you cannot self-refer.

In Devon, the public diagnostic service is the Devon Autism and ADHD Service (DAANA). At the time of publication, the current waiting time between being referred to DAANA and the first assessment appointment is up to three years. At present (due to Covid 19) DAANA are doing assessments online, if you consider yourself unable to do an online assessment please inform the team and ask for a reasonable adjustment.

Private Diagnostic Services

If you don't want to use the public diagnostic route, you can also seek an assessment from a private provider. These will usually offer shorter waiting times than the public service, but will also charge for their services, ranging from £200 to over £1,000. Additionally, some service providers will only accept a formal diagnosis from a public provider.

At present, there is only one private service in the Devon area that offers diagnosis of autism spectrum conditions.

National Diagnostic Services

Lorna Wing Centres

These internationally-recognised diagnostic centres, named after the pioneering psychologist who coined the term 'Autistic spectrum', are operated by the National Autistic Society (NAS). These are open to people of all ages and accept both NHS referrals and private applicants.

At present, there are two centres: one in Kent and one in Essex.

The NAS also maintains a directory of assessment and diagnostic services available in the UK:

Support Organisations for Autistic Adults

There are a number of support groups available to autistic adults living in Devon. Many of these allow anyone who identifies as autistic to attend, regardless of whether they have a diagnosis. This can be a useful source of support and information for those who are waiting for an assessment or are thinking about getting one.

Dimensions for Autism CIC (DFA)

Dimensions for Autism is a Community Interest Company offering support for autistic adults, and those who identify as autistic, who live in the Devon area. You do not need an official diagnosis to become a member, but the organisation focuses on those who have few or no support needs. Full meeting details are available on request via email.

Education Support

Since autism is officially classified as a disability, Autistic people who are in education are entitled to assistance to support them during their studies.

The Local Offer

Each local authority maintains a public database, called the Local Offer, that details all services available in its area to those who have Special Educational Needs or Disabilities (SEND).

See Statutory Services for full information.

EHCP

If general SEND support does not meet your child's needs, you may be able to get an Education, Health and Care Plan (EHCP) from your local authority. This will identify the child's health, education and social needs, and lay out the support they require.

See Statutory Services (page 11) for full information.

Disabled Students Allowance (DSA)

A financial support scheme for students in higher (university) education with a mental health issue, long-term illness or any other disability, the Disabled Students Allowance scheme provides grants to pay for specialist equipment, support staff, extra travel costs or any other health-related expenses.

The grants do not need to be repaid, however, can only be used for costs that are directly related to your course. The amount you receive will depend on an assessment of your needs.

Preparing for Adulthood (PfA)

A national programme supported by several different organisations, this organisation works with local authorities to promote SEND education that emphasises life skills, employment and independence from an early age. Their website has downloadable information documents on a wide range of subjects, from education to health to independent living.

Eat That Frog CIC

Based in south Devon, Eat That Frog is a Community Interest Company that offers training courses for young people who have SEN, providing a combination of academic and employability skills. They also provide support and one-to-one mentoring for those already in an apprenticeship. These services are open to anyone aged 16-18 with SEN of some kind, as well as those aged over 18 who have an active EHCP.

The charity has training centres in Torquay, Paignton and Newton Abbot, which are also open to those who need support or internet access to search for jobs.

Employment Support

As with education support, Autistic people in employment are entitled to a number of support schemes and protections.

Disability Confident Employers

The Disability Confident scheme is designed to help employers recruit and retain disabled people and people with health conditions for their skills and talent. Information about organisations that gain one of the three 'Disability Confident' levels will be shared via this scheme, with an aim being that the scheme will also provide information to those who have disabilities about Disability Confident Employers.

Appendix 4: Reasonable Adjustments and the Equality Act (2010)

The Equality Act (2010) applies to England, Wales and Scotland. Implementing the provisions of EU directive 2006/54/EC.

The full text of the act is available at www.legislation.gov.uk/ukpga/2010/15/contents

There are guidance notes from HM Government available at www.gov.uk/guidance/equality-act-2010-guidance

Here is a guide from the CAB www.citizensadvice.org.uk/law-andcourts/discrimination/about-discrimination/equality-act-2010-discrimination-andyour-rights and a guide from ACAS, mostly concerned with employmenthttps://archive.acas.org.uk/media/4267/Equality-and-discrimination-understand-thebasics/pdf/Equality and discrimination understand the basics - July 2019.pdf

Autism falls under the "protected characteristic" of "disability". Whilst there is no need to have an official diagnosis this can be helpful.

The act defines the following as unlawful:

Direct discrimination: That is treating someone less favourably because they possess (or are assumed to possess) a protected characteristic. It doesn't matter if this is deliberate or not.

Indirect discrimination: That is where there is a rule, policy or similar which applies to everyone in the same way. But which places people with a certain protected characteristic at a disadvantage.

Discrimination arising from disability: This is where disabled people are treated unfavourably because of something connected to their disability. It may be difficult to tell this apart from indirect discrimination.

Harassment: Unwanted behaviour in relation to a protected characteristic which results in the recipient feeling intimidated, offended, degraded or similar.

Victimisation: This is where someone is treated less favourably because of making a previous complaint about discrimination or supported someone else in making such a complaint.

In certain cases, indirect and disability discrimination may not be unlawful. This is known as "objective justification". What this means is that the organization in question needs to have a good reason for doing so and could not achieve this without discriminating.

The following are defined in the act.

Positive action: This mainly applies to employment. Enabling an employer to offer a job or promotion to an Autistic person over a non-Autistic person. Assuming that both are qualified and competent for the job in question.

Reasonable adjustments: These are changes organisations make in order to address discrimination arising from the protected characteristic of disability. These could include changing how things are done, including policies and procedures: changing physical features, including ambient light and sound levels or providing extra aids and services.

Since autism is a spectrum condition, applicable reasonable adjustments depend very much on the individual, thus any examples of reasonable adjustments should be considered a suggestion.

Also covered in the act is "public sector equality duty". The organisations include central and local government, the NHS, police, regulatory authorities, the armed forces, schools & universities, as well as companies carrying out public functions, such as electricity, water, gas or telephone companies and housing associations. These have specific duties to consider how their policies and decisions affect people protected under the Equality Act. Specifically, to do the following: eliminate unlawful discrimination, advance equality of opportunity & foster or encourage good relations between people who share a protected characteristic and those who don't.

Chapter 18 of the book "PDA by PDAers", by Sally Cat (ISBN 1785925369) covers several general reasonable adjustments.

These include: rewording and explaining rules and procedures, allowing the use of email (or similar) rather than the telephone, keeping people informed, giving clear rather than approximate times.

Although this chapter is written from the point of view from someone with a PDA profile of autism, it is likely to be useful to Autistic people generally, for example, many Autistic people dislike using the phone and this can become a barrier to access to services.

Education

Disability Rights Uk has a list of reasonable adjustments for Autistic university students. These may also be useful to other students.

Section 4 of www.disabilityrightsuk.org/adjustments-disabled-students
These include: Having access to a specific member of staff for support needs or concerns. Having course materials and exams in clear plain English, avoiding unnecessary use of metaphor and inference. Having a written transcript of information usually given verbally.

Work

Here is some information with regards to reasonable adjustments in the workplace, from Bristol Autism Support https://www.bristolautismsupport.org/reasonable-adjustments-at-work-for-autistic-adults/

These include: Headphones or access to a quiet area to avoid sensory overload, use of text messaging in place of phone or face to face meetings, flexible working hours and not having to take part in workplace social events.

Information can also be found via this TUC report "Autism in the Workplace" www.tuc.org.uk/sites/default/files/Autism.pdf

These include: avoiding variable shift patterns, having a quiet working environment, support in the case of changes being made, provision of a mentor and avoiding 'hot desking'.

And from Autism Network Scotland:

employment.autismnetworkscotland.org.uk/information-for-employers/reasonable-adjustments/

These include: Clear job descriptions which avoid hyperbole and jargon and meeting agendas to be followed and distributed prior to meetings. Autism Network Scotland also make the point that, in practice, only a few adjustments may be required.

Appendix 5: Pathological Demand Avoidance (PDA)

This information is important, as different strategies are required for those who have PDA to those who have ASC. Typical autism strategies won't work with a PDA profile.

PDA as with other Autism profiles is a lifelong disability and PDAers need for support will change at different stages of their life, depending on how their condition affects them. Evidence so far, suggests that the earlier the diagnosis, with the appropriate support given, the more able and independent they are likely to become.

People with a demand avoidant profile share difficulties with others on the autism spectrum in social communication, social interaction and restricted and repetitive patterns of behaviours (including sensory seeking or sensory avoiding behaviours).

However, PDAers are driven to avoid everyday demands and expectations to an extreme extent. This demand avoidant behaviour is rooted in an anxiety-based need to be in control of their environment and avoid other people's demands and expectations.

The demand avoidant profile is increasingly being recognised and it's important to understand the distinct behaviour profile as it has implications for the way a person is best supported. Those with the PDA profile will need tailored support, with a clear understanding of their needs. Strategies that tend to be successful for the other profiles on the spectrum tend not to work for those with the PDA Profile.

People with a demand avoidant profile may appear to have better social understanding and communication skills than others on the autism spectrum, which they often use this to their advantage. They may use manipulation, distraction, giving excuses and could even have Non-epileptic Seizures brought on by anxiety. However, they might not really have as good an understanding of social matters as it seems. At times the anxiety can be so intense, that even if they are aware of what they are doing, they are unable to change their way of behaviour as their brain goes into a coping strategy mode, which can turn into full blown meltdown and exhaustion. They can be confrontational and impulsive. PDAers may mask how they feel especially girls, which is why it goes undetected.

The distinctive features of a demand avoidant profile include: resists and avoids the everyday demands of life; uses social strategies as part of avoidance as described above, they may appear sociable, but can lack understanding; experiences excessive mood swings and impulsivity; may appear comfortable in role play and pretence or the obsessive behaviour is most often focused on people.

People with this the PDA profile can appear controlling and dominating, especially when they feel anxious. However, they can also be enigmatic and charming when they feel secure and in control. It's really important to acknowledge that these people have a hidden disability and that getting the appropriate support (which is different) to other ASC profiles as the strategies used for other ASC will not work for PDAers.
