

Have you benefited from compounded hormone therapy?
If so, you won't be happy with what the FDA is planning.

The FDA has never been a fan of compounding, but now it looks to be making a move that could keep millions of people from using a critical medication.

Last year, the FDA paid for a study of compounded hormone therapy (cBHT). The result: The study concluded that there isn't much clinical evidence for or against cBHT.

Strangely, though, the study recommended that CBHT be restricted. Never mind that millions of Americans use cBHT every day and rely on it. Never mind that the study didn't find any significant negative effects of cBHT. Also, the study didn't even ask patients whether cBHT worked!

But now:

The FDA is using that study as an excuse to consider limiting or even outright banning compounded hormone therapy.

You read that right: If you or someone you know uses cBHT, it might soon be a lot harder or even impossible to get.

Compounding pharmacies across the United States are trying to fight back, but we need your help. It's simple: Tell us your story about how compounded hormone therapy has affected your life.

We are collecting thousands of these stories to try to convince the FDA that compounded hormone therapy is too important.
